Abstract: This article outlines an extraordinary document: the detailed description of the construction site of the wooden dome of the Halle aux Blés in Paris built according to the method of Philibert De l’Orme (July 1782-January 1783). It ponders the status of this document written by the architect Jacques Molinos and questions the sharing of knowledge between craftspeople and architects and the importance of rarely described operations: drawing blueprints, raising scaffolding, and lifting equipment.
