Abstract: From a narratological and generic approach, this contribution questions the Edem Awumey's first four novels. In these works, the road does indeed produce a road-novel which expresses the telescoping of genres (novel and cinema) and the expression of an African novel which, faced with deadly political violence, takes the initiative to be on the road, after having wandered in circles for a long time in the streets of the city. There, perhaps, a turning point in the African novel can be read.
