Abstract: If the rare texts of dogmatic character which Ch. Hauter published hardly allow us to have a precise idea of the doctrinal content of his thought, they nevertheless testify to the way in which, according to him, dogmas are meant to be approached. This approach, which is closely linked to the phenomenological work of J. Héring, is that of a theology of religious experience, understood as a theology that is constructed according to the way in which divine reality is given to subjectivity.
